BENJAMIN FRANKLIN BUTLER.

Gen. BUTLER was for many years and until recently one of the picturesque figures of the country. For forty years his life was part of its political history. His talents were such as are recognized as characteristic of the native New Englander, but his traits were exaggerated expressions of the underlying qualities of the people from whom he sprang and among whom he lived. His quickness, brilliancy, dash, boldness, ingenuity, were simply unusually strong manifestations of the shrewd, calculating, adroit race that has won wealth and achieved distinction among the bleak and stony hills of New Hampshire and Massachusetts.

There was very little sentimentalism in the public career of Gen. BUTLER. He was not thrilled with the anti-slavery sentiment which inspired his neighbors. He was a friend of the South, an ally and supporter of BRECKINRIDGE against DOUGLAS. He went into the war first because he was a brigadier-general of Massachusetts militia, and secondly because he felt behind him the strong earnestness of the North.

In everything he was an opportunist. When he was in public life he took advantage of what seemed to him to be his occasions with the same alertness with which he dashed at the sudden exposure of an adversary's weak point in the trial of a case. He always went to the extreme limit of the logic of his position. He was an extreme Democrat before the war, an extreme Republican after the war and an extreme Greenbacker still later. During the conflict he made use of all his resources not only to defeat but to humiliate his enemy. The wonderful ingenuity with which he invented phrases and twisted law to his military purposes is matter of history. He was always the criminal lawyer. He led his armies, commanded his posts, represented his people in Congress, administered the office of Governor and ran for the Presidency as if he were struggling for an acquittal before a jury of twelve men.

He was an old man when he died, but he was zealous and energetic to the last. He will not be remembered as a model of public virtues, but as the man who forgot his Democracy when he could make his way to the front of the Republican party and turned his back on the Republican party when that organization would no longer serve his ambition. He returned to the Democratic party, but again deserted it when it too failed to recognize what he considered to be his claims.

His reputation will rest on the brilliant audacity with which he made his way in the world. He was one of the most resourceful men of his time, and in his way one of the most successful.

Cleveland, if he appoint either man's candidate, will give the place to Judge Herrick's friend, though it will not surprise any one if he should not do this, for he would not give the same place to a friend of Daniel Manning, and Mr. Manning was the Secretary of the Treasury, a member of his Cabinet. There, then, the struggle will probably begin, and if the premises laid down by Mr. Cleveland's friends are correct there can be little doubt that it will end in defeat for the State leaders.

THREAT OF A BOLT.

In the mean time Mr. Maxwell, who hates Hill and his friends with a bitter hate, dating back to the days when he tied a State Committee against Hill, will be, according to the present outlook, Assistant Postmaster-General, and he will appoint the officers in every hamlet and village who will officer the Cleveland army in the fight at the primaries for delegates to the State Convention. These primaries will be called by and held at place to be named by the present State machine. It is there that the Cleveland men fear

The advertisement features a central illustration of a globe with latitude and longitude lines. Two packs of Bull Durham Smoking Tobacco are prominently displayed in the foreground. The pack on the left is labeled 'GENUINE DURHAM' and 'SMOKING TOBACCO'. The pack on the right is also labeled 'GENUINE DURHAM' and 'SMOKING TOBACCO'. Below the packs, the words 'SMOKING TOBACCO' are written in large, bold letters. The background of the advertisement is a light color with a subtle pattern.
