Major General O. O. Howard before the Congregational Club at Tremont
the last night.

the island a permanent relief.
"Some men cry out that the Cubans are uneducated. We have been educating them for years. They have had the benefits of instruction all along our coast, from Key West to the Rio Grande. Many of the young men who are with Gomez to-day have been scientifically educated in our polytechnic institutions. Our senators tell us that the Cuban people who have any means have carefully educated their people & children.

~~At~~ the present he said:
 "I have read of many a case of intervention, but I have never known one more thoroughly needed or more completely righteous than the one proposed in Cuba. The French intervened to help our fathers in their struggle. The cause was just, and for a principle, a great principle — the principle of human rights on which we have thrived. The Cuban patriots have done as well as our fathers. They have resisted much longer — they have shown their faith by their works; and they deserve the sympathy and help of this republic, and but does, fellow mortals like men amongst men, that it recalls those familiar saws:—

"That they may take who have the power,
"And they may keep who can,"

"Plays such tricks before high heaven,
As make the very angels weep."

- (c) "Why has man the will or power
To make his fellows mourn?
"And every time brings full proof
That man was made to mourn."

Johnson's Victory

General Johnson's Victory

In the Summer of 1755. the Northern Colonies raised a body of about five thousand men, who were intended to take Crown Point, a fort fifteen miles south of Ticonderoga.

General Johnson who commanded these troops marched them to Lake George, where he encamped to wait for letters to transport the men down the lake.

While he lay in that situation a body of French forces under Baron Dieskau, advanced by South Bay, with a view to attack and seize the camp at the postage, now called Fort Edward.

Bush

understanding that the place was defended by cannon, and that General Johnson's camp was destitute of large guns, the Baron altered his plan and attacked General Johnson's troops. The French were repulsed with the loss of several hundred men.

The map belongs to General Hon Robert Monckton, whose only daughter gave it to me

Gen^l Monckton led the expedition against 4 Point Nova Scotia, associated with Winslow in 1755.

Monckton held the command at Quebec after Wolfe fell while wounded, when Gen^l Townsend succeeded.

How would this do?

Copy of Extracts. See letter to J. D. Vautier, April 20, 1892.

After General Howard examined the ground, he concluded the only tenable position for his limited force was Cemetery Hill, but as a temporary measure to relieve the increasing pressure on the 1st Corps, ordered his first division (Barlow) and third division, (Schimf) to seize and hold Oak Ridge, on the right of the first corps. It appears he had the triple purpose in mind of developing the confederate strength; protecting the town, and holding back Lee for Meade's Army to assemble at Gettysburg. The occupation of the ridge was then feasible. No considerable confederate force at this time, about 12, was in sight. A confederate brigade, a battery or two, covered by a line of sharpshooters, was the extent of the confederate force there at hand. But really a movement was only practicable as future developments will show, for the purpose mentioned, all of Lee's strength present was at that time unknown to the Union Generals. General Schurz's idea about posting the corps was in thorough keeping with Howard's original idea, General Howard having left the detail to his able mind. He directed the third division to deploy on the right of the first corps in two lines, and his first division to form on the right of the third; the second brigade (Ames) to be in echelon behind the right of the first brigade. Then with Dilger's and Wheeler's batteries to the front, he advanced toward the ridge. He further requested a brigade of the second division to be posted near the railroad depot, in readiness to charge in force, should the confederates move on the right. But in Schurz's temporary absence from that point, Barlow, eager to charge, moves his division forward past the Poor House, driving Doles skirmishers off and occupy-

After General Howard examined the ground, he concluded the only feasible position for his limited force was Cemetery Hill, but as a temporary measure to relieve the increasing pressure on the 1st Corps, ordered his first division (Barlow) and third division (Schurz) to seize and hold Oak Ridge, on the right of the first corps. It appears he had the triple purpose in mind of developing the Confederate strength; protecting the town, and holding back Lee for Meade's Army to assemble at Gettysburg. The occupation of the ridge was then feasible. No considerable Confederate force at this time, about 12, was in sight. A Confederate brigade, a battery or two, covered by a line of sharpshooters, was the extent of the only practicable as future developments will show, for the purpose mentioned, all of Lee's strength present was at that time unknown to the Union Generals. General Schurz's idea about posting the corps was in thorough keeping with Howard's original idea, General Howard having left the detail to his able mind. He directed the third division to deploy on the right of the first corps in two lines, and his first division to form on the right of the third; the second brigade (Ames) to be an echelon behind the right of the first brigade. Then with Dillger's and Wheeler's batteries to the front, he advanced toward the ridge. He further requested a brigade of the second division to be posted near the railroad depot, in readiness to charge in force, should the Confederates move on the right. But in Schurz's temporary absence from that point, Barlow, eager to charge, moves his division forward past the Poor House, driving Dool's skirmishers off and occupying the hill known now as "Barlow's Knoll" - thereby breaking the right of the 11th Corps, increasing the echelon and throwing the front too much in air. At the best the 11th Corps necessarily presented thin lines broken en echelon, to resist the tremendous impact that presently is to come with crushing power upon it. The fact is, the ground occupied where that impact had been was unsuited to stay for much time a strong attack, and though the soldiers did the best they could, pluckily contesting an uphill fight from the beginning. A close inspection of this field since the war, by prominent military men, has led to the expression that it was naturally weak as a defensive line to bear the brunt of Ewell's attack, etc.

But as there was no opposition at that early stage, it is useless to speculate what the result might have been, if this or that had been formed here or there; guesses do not win victories, but after the battle any one can fight it over, point out the mistakes and win a brilliant victory every time.

Towards sunset on the eighteenth of January, 1893, several officers and men belonging to the little garrison of Fort Wood on Bedloe's Island in New York Harbor, were skating on the ice that had formed all the way to the New Jersey shore. As it grew later the officers and men took off their skates and went back to the island as it was near the first call for Retreat, the final roll call of the day. But one officer remained, Lieutenant Frank Daniel Webster, Sixth Infantry, U. S. A. With him the young son of the Commanding Officer of the Post, Alexander Maccomb Wetherill, a boy fourteen years of age. Scattered about on the ice were three or four young children belonging to the Light House employes and further out toward the National Docks could be seen the figures of a man and woman walking on the ice. The man was walking toward the woman, having accomplished the object for which he had gone out, viz., - to be able to say that he had walked from Bedloe's Island to the National Dock. He was Mr. Charles Miller, an engineer in the Light House establishment, and the woman was his wife, to whom he had been married about a month previous.

As his wife drew nearer he is horrified to see her suddenly sink through the ice, and, thinking of nothing but her rescue, flies to her assistance, breaks through the ice and in an instant both are struggling in the water; - the current is swift, the ice crumbles on the edge as they try to throw themselves upon it. Lieutenant Webster and Maccomb Wetherill are skating some three hundred yards away from the island and about one hundred yards from the imperilled man and woman; Mac., as the boy is called, discovered them and at once raised an alarm, and Lieutenant Webster, who was not far away, hastened to the scene. Realizing the danger of approaching the edge of the treacherous ice Lieutenant Webster first threw his overcoat to the man thinking that before it should become saturated with water, it might aid in keeping him afloat, and then lay down upon his face and seized the woman by the hand, instructing Mac Wetherill to hold him securely by the feet; the ice at this time seemed to be sinking and the rescuers were in imminent peril. In the meantime several soldiers of Company "A." Sixth United States Infantry, who had heard Mac's outcry, were running to the rescue. Among them were Privates Leroy S. Hotchkiss and Dennis Guiney who carried ropes, and Charles F. Rodenstein, who had the good judgment to provide himself with a board. Hotchkiss at once fearlessly exchanged places with Lieutenant Webster, grasping the hands of the almost paralyzed woman, the board was placed beneath her, a line was formed and she was dragged unconscious from the water.

While this was being done Private Guiney had thrown the rope in the form of a noose over the head of the man, who was so helpless that he could not use his hands to hold it, but held it with his teeth, and he also, was drawn out of the water; the rescue being effected as the ice was sinking under the feet of the rescuers.
