You know, I think it's wonderful to be talking about the library, because we are taking the services of the library for granted, and when we are presenting our wonderful exhibitions at the museum, and we do our research, we learn about our collections, what we often don't talk about is the fact that we couldn't do it without the library. There is so much that, on a daily basis, we are gaining from accessing library records, from getting library books, using your art library, as well as the loan, I mean, the main library, and inter-library loan services, that it's very hard to even envision what this place would look like without the library. And I think for the scholarship, and for the conversations that we are having at the museum, the library is almost as important as the art collection, because we wouldn't know what to do with this stuff if it wasn't for the discourse that you are reproducing and that you are providing us access to. Of course, that also includes more and more, access to electronic resources, which we are using frequently, but as everybody knows, if we don't, if we wouldn't have access to the vetted records, and the scholarship that you provide us with, and we would just rely on Google searches, we would very quickly go astray with our own work on the collections, so it's amazing.
