I've been really grateful for the Library's assistance over the course of this summer. We are preparing a new course for the fall, it's history 2624, Historical Simulations. And in this course, what we're gonna be doing is working through contemporary tabletop games, board games with historical themes to try to suss out the capacity of the modern generation of board games to actually engage in historical argumentation. So, this is required of course, that we actually have the games, and the library has been extremely generous in purchasing games for our use. And the college in general has been very supportive of this effort. My research assistant over the summer, young man named Danny Banks, has been helping us prepare games. We've been playing them in the Media Commons. Kevin Travers, and others in I.T., have been helping us film those sessions, so that we can analyze them later on and think about what the best way of incorporating games into the classroom might be. So, this is an effort that we're pretty excited about, and it is only been possible because of the Library's help.
