The library itself has been absolutely wonderful in supporting the independent and original research of my students in the classes that I teach. I primarily teach the history of Japan and the history of east Asia as a region. And so that can be really challenging for students at Bowdoin, not because they're students at Bowdoin but because it's really hard to access some of these histories without knowing Chinese or Japanese or Korean or Mongolian or what have you. So I'm looking for primary sources for them to be able to write their research papers for my classes and then also their honors projects have been really difficult. And that's where the Bowdoin library has really stepped in to help out. And so they've purchased two major databases. The first one is the Japan Times database, which is an English language newspaper database from Japan, from Tokyo, from 1897. So from 1897 to about 1997 and then a second database, which collects 18 different newspapers from China, also all in the English language from about 1850 to 1950. So the students have worked with these databases to look for primary sources in English about events taking place in the time period that we talk about in class.
